Let's Talk About Rex

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

Humboldt County First District Supervisor Rex Bohn just really doesn't seem to get it.

Now, I qualify that claim since we haven't had a chance to have a good, old fashioned on-the-record interview with Bohn because, as a matter of personal policy, he doesn't talk to the Journal. So Bohn has declined our requests to talk to him about he and his fellow supervisors' decision back in February to hire David Marcus, a Florida insurance adjuster, to be the county's public defender. He even declined to respond to our two-question email, in which we lobbed him and his cohorts a couple of softballs asking why they felt Marcus was the right person for the job and what they would tell constituents who have expressed concerns.

So it was with great interest that I tuned into KINS Radio's Talk Shop last week after hearing that host Brian Papstein questioned Bohn about Marcus' hire and the backlash it has caused. Listening to the interview — a transcript of which is now on the Journal's website — some things leapt out.

"I had lunch with Mr. Marcus the other day," Bohn tells Papstein, "and he said, you know, he said things aren't that — he says the paper makes it sound a lot worse than it is. Things are going good."

Bohn concedes there has been some "kicking and screaming," but quickly pivots to say he's personally talked to "four or five" attorneys who say he "seems to be doing a good job," "seems like a nice guy" and "is qualified" because he's "worked cases."

Fair enough, right? But the thing is, 17 employees from Marcus' department — most if not all of them at-will employees who can be fired for just about any reason — have now taken the unprecedented step of sending letters to the board of supervisors saying Marcus is unqualified and incompetent.

So about those qualifications. Here are the basics we've gleaned from spending a portion of the last eight weeks looking into the issue: At the time of his hiring, Marcus hadn't practiced criminal law since 2011; he'd spent the previous three years living in Florida and working primarily as an insurance claims adjuster, while moonlighting about 10 hours a week as an apparently unpaid contract attorney for a Walnut Creek law firm; that firm, by the way, has no website, no web presence and won't answer simple questions about areas of practice or even confirm that Marcus worked there.

Let's stop here for a moment because maybe you're thinking being a criminal defense attorney is like riding a bike and, well, what's five years away from the courtroom? Consider this: During Marcus' hiatus from criminal law, California passed a landmark prison realignment bill and Proposition 47, which have combined to reduce swaths of felonies to misdemeanors, reduced penalties and impacted who's eligible for diversion programs like drug court.

Back to those qualifications. Marcus' last stint in criminal law? Apparently it was controversial, filled with allegations that as Lassen County's chief public defender he failed to show up to work more than 40 percent of the time or carry his fair share of the office caseload, and that he was too cozy with prosecutors and a less-than-stalwart advocate for the county's indigent.

So why the controversy? Well, according to Bohn, it's our fault.

"If I reacted every time one of these weekly newspapers sends out — or advertising magazines — sends something out, hell, I would have quit five years ago," Bohn tells Papstein when asked if he's comfortable with Marcus' hire. "I mean, it's just they have to sell their papers so they can't just say, 'Hey, this guy's great.' So they say, 'This guy's not great because we said so,' and I take that in stride."

Well, first, somebody should remind Bohn that we don't have to sell papers — we give them away — but let's not get off topic.

Bohn can take a page out of the Trump playbook all he wants and tell friendly radio hosts about "fake news" and whatever other blathering incoherence rules the day. What he can't do is escape the fact that he now has 17 employees telling him the man he just hired for what is arguably one of the county's most important positions hasn't a clue what he's doing. And he can't escape that the county is now facing a lawsuit from one of Humboldt's most lauded attorneys challenging whether Marcus meets the minimum state requirements to be a public defender. To be eligible, according to those requirements, one must have spent the prior year as a "practicing attorney in all of the courts of the state."

Does Marcus meet that definition? It's unclear, in part because there is no case law we've found determining whether simply being licensed to practice law and working remotely from another states fits the definition. Maybe that's because no other California county has seen fit to hire an out-of-state insurance adjuster to be its public defender.

So I would argue that Bohn has some explaining to do and that he should do it to us. The fact that he and a certain fifth district supervisor — who hasn't returned a single Journal phone call since I arrived here in January of 2014 — seem to think it's OK to stonewall one of this county's papers of record is unfortunate. It only hurts their employees, the people they serve and their interests when they fail to articulate their stances on issues to this newspaper, which, I might add, is the only one in Humboldt that folks who can't afford a subscription or Internet service — you know, those most likely to be represented by a public defender — can regularly read. After all, if Bohn had responded to our email about Marcus with a resounding, "He's great!," we would have printed it.

As for us, the silence coming from the seats of two supervisorial districts is disappointing but we've kept on, pulling in seven more California Newspaper Publishers Association awards and a California Society of Professional Journalists freedom of information award for 2016. We may not be doing as well as the failing New York Times, but last year was our most profitable on record.

But all that is beside the point of the day, which is that there are some very legitimate concerns being raised about the county's new public defender and, contrary to Bohn's assertions, this isn't fake news. At a minimum, the issues swirling around Marcus are beginning to erode already fragile public trust in the office.

With all that in mind, I've got an idea of how Bohn and his fellow Supes, if they insist on standing by Marcus, can help restore some of that trust: They can take a pledge that if they or any of their loved ones are accused of a crime, they'll ask Marcus to defend them.

I think that would be great. ●

Gone to Potter

Editor:

Your feature about the potters, Shannon and David, is a fine story ("Containment Strategy," March 30). I was leafing through a copy of the Journal while having lunch in Arcata, looking for a crossword puzzle.

The photo of the lidded jar caught my attention, as a former '60s potter, and I read your review of the show. I still have a wood fired kiln and a clay deposit on my place in the Mendo hills so I was especially "fired up" by your description of David's work. Gabrielle Gopinath should be writing for the New York Times. Thanks for promoting hand-made ceramic art and craft.

Women Needed

Editor:

What we have learned from the Trump administration is that we need leaders who are smarter, more experienced, hard-working, inclusive, compassionate, more helpful in their communities, less militaristic, enthusiastic about having quality health care for all, for better education, affordable housing and universal childcare.

In other words, we need more women leaders.

Every election and every appointment is an opportunity to get another smart, experienced woman into office.

On Wednesday, April 19, the Arcata City Council will appoint a new city councilperson to fill a vacant seat. ("Timeline Proposed for Filling Arcata Council Seat," Feb. 27.) Seven people are contending for the seat. Among these contenders is Robin Baker. I have heard her speak, read her resume and had the opportunity to meet with her to discuss her concerns and visions for the community. Her ideas and insights are intelligent and savvy.

Robin is currently a member of the Arcata Planning Commission, the Chief Operations Officer of the McKinleyville Family Resource Center and Chair of the Humboldt Network of Family Resource Centers. She is a graduate of the Cascadia Leadership Program, volunteered as a court-appointed Special Advocate for CASA, served as a board member and treasurer of the Emma Center and is a current participant in the Racial Equity Workshop for Trainers.

She is more qualified for a seat on the Arcata City Council than the president of the United States.

On Thursday, April 13th, there will be a chance for the public to hear the seven candidates say why they each want to be on the council. Please go to Arcata City Hall this Thursday from 6 to 9 p.m. to listen, ask questions and show support for the candidate of your choice. As for me, I'll be rooting for Robin!

Claim seeks $1.44M in damages in right-to-die case

Attorney alleges county violated couple’s civil rights

By Kimberly Wear
newsroom@northcoastjournal.com

Years before Dick Magney was admitted to St. Joseph Hospital suffering from a series of life-threatening conditions, he had spent time at a local nursing home while recovering from leg surgery.

That experience left the former truck driver, who for decades battled constant pain and chronic illness, determined to never again find himself in the same situation. With his health declining, Dick Magney and his wife, Judy, had an attorney draw up an advanced directive outlining his final instructions.

Those included being allowed to die with “dignity” and “without prolonging my death with medical treatment ... that will not benefit me.” Dick Magney did not get his wish.

Soon after he was admitted to the hospital in February of 2015, the county obtained a court order that forced him to receive antibiotics for a heart infection even though he had already refused surgery. That temporarily reversed the palliative care choices made by the Magneys with the support of his attending physician, who had determined further treatment would be futile.

While he lived long enough to see the county’s intervention overturned, the self-described “stubborn Swede” died a few months later in the same nursing home he had tried so hard to avoid. He was 74.

“It’s so sad. ... It’s tragic that he had to pass away that way,” says attorney Allison Jackson, who represented the couple in their months-long legal battle with the county. “It’s tragic that the family had to go through what they went through.”

Late last year, an appellate court awarded Judy Magney attorney fees and other costs associated with the case in a scathing opinion that called the county’s actions “profoundly disturbing.”

Now settlement talks are underway. Jackson filed a claim on March 30 asking for $1.44 million. While that amount included $288,000 for Judy Magney’s legal bills and other costs, Jackson is also seeking $1.15 million in punitive damages, which will require a separate lawsuit if the county doesn’t agree to close out the case without further legal action.

In the filing, Jackson alleges county employees involved in the case committed elder abuse, inflicted intentional emotional distress, defamed the Magneys, falsely imprisoned and committed medical battery on Dick Magney, disclosed private facts about the couple and conspired to violate their civil rights, among other claims.

That included a period of time when the county refused to give Judy Magney any information about her husband's condition while he was under a temporary conservatorship, an action Jackson described as "abject cruelty and vindictiveness."

During the same temporary guardianship, the county also failed to apply for MediCal benefits on Dick Magney's behalf, which "created even more emotional and financial burdens for the Magneys," Jackson writes in the claim.

"Sadly, Mr. Magney slowly died on the County's terms, not his own, in a skilled nursing home the County chose for him, the cost of which, once the benefits ran out, was to be borne exclusively by the Magneys," the claim states.

Jackson says she hopes this final chapter in the case will soon come to a close.

"I'm still very guardedly optimistic that the people in charge of making the decision in this matter, the board of supervisors, are all very kind, compassionate people who will make the right decision to stop this," she says. "What happened here was horrific."

County Counsel Jeffrey Blanck did not respond to the Journal's request for comment but was quoted in a New York Times article this week, saying the county stepped in because Dick Magney had requested antibiotics at times and "he was coming in and out of competency."

Blanck also spoke with the legal blog Northern California Record in February, saying the forced treatment was an attempt to make Dick Magney more comfortable after the county received a report of possible neglect.

"We weren't requesting surgery or cutting off an arm," the county counsel says in the article. "It was simply, 'You need antibiotics to treat a condition that was painful.'"

Jackson calls his comments "callous" and points to other portions of his interview in the claim, saying he and the county continue to falsely accuse Judy Magney of abuse without evidence.

to justify their civil rights violations,” she says, noting the purpose of an advance directive is to make sure final wishes are followed, especially when patients can no longer participate in their own care decisions.

The case started soon after Dick Magney was admitted to St. Joseph Hospital suffering from malnutrition, likely related to his heart infection, and pressure sores in the outline of a toilet seat from his long bouts in the bathroom due to colon issues. He was terminally ill.

Adult Protective Services started an investigation after receiving the report of possible caregiver neglect. That led to a series of court petitions by Deputy County Counsel Blair Angus, asserting the need for the county to take over his medical care decisions and later attempts to place him under a conservatorship with the Public Guardian’s Office.

The court filings failed to mention that Dick Magney’s treating physician — the medical authority under California’s health care decision law — had already determined his prognosis was grim and that he faced a “really terrible quality of life” even if he made some sort of recovery.

Instead the county depended on a statement from a VA physician — who had not seen the Navy veteran in months and was not involved in his hospital care — that stated Dick Magney could die without treatment.

An appellate panel found the county was only able to temporarily seize control away from the Magneys by misleading the court with an “appallingly inadequate” request that included “glaringly incompetent and inadmissible evidence” and “multiple levels of hearsay.”

“We cannot subscribe to a scenario where a governmental agency acts to overturn the provisions of a valid advance directive by presenting the court with an incomplete discussion of the relevant law and a misleading compendium of incompetent and inadmissible evidence and, worse, by withholding critical evidence about the clinical assessments and opinions of the primary physician because that evidence does not accord with the agency’s own agenda,” the opinion states.

The county never pursued the unsubstantiated neglect allegations but continued to assert the claim throughout the case, saying there were concerns Judy Magney was not following her husband’s wishes.

According to Jackson’s claim, the appellate ruling, which the county unsuccessfully tried to have depublished, “provides a liability ‘roadmap.’”

That includes, she contends, stripping away claims to “qualified immunity” for those involved in the case — the legal protection afforded to government employees “insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known,” according to case law.

Jackson points to the phrasing of the opinion, which states: “No reasonable person, let alone a governmental agency, would have pursued such a course.” That, she says, opens a legal door to pursuing claims against individuals as well as the county.

While no one is implying “evil intent,” she also says there are valid questions about the conduct of APS supervisors who failed to interfere when a decision was made to challenge the clinical assessment by Dick Magney’s doctor and members of the county counsel’s office, who purposefully withheld information from the court.

“No one has stepped up to the plate and said, ‘What we did was wrong and we apologize.’ ... It’s almost like they would do it again,” Jackson says. “That’s not how you fix things.” ●

Farmer to Farmer

Landowner group takes a belated stance on pot

By Linda Stansberry
newsroom@northcoastjournal.com

The Buckeye Conservancy, a local nonprofit that represents large landowners in Humboldt County, has released an official position paper on the cannabis industry, censuring the “commercial farming, production and marketing of federally illegal marijuana in Humboldt County, and/or its neighboring counties.”

The paper, published last month, continues to say: “We realize that the voters of the State of California have deemed marijuana to be legal for both medical and recreational use, despite its federal status. This situation has led to a quasi-legal status for marijuana, and an exponential growth in production that has created intense pressure on North Coast communities and natural resources, especially the over-drafting of water diverted for plantation irrigation.”

So why now, and why is this important?

Buckeye Executive Director Lauren Sizemore says local farmers, ranchers and other landowners have been disproportionately impacted by the cannabis industry, and that Buckeye board meetings were constantly being derailed because members needed to discuss how cannabis was affecting their land, stock and water. Common complaints included more traffic on rural roads, reckless driving, the “white noise” of generators, stray dogs that attack stock and general negative environmental impact of large grows. So the group formed a committee and, from that, a position paper that delineated its official stance on the industry.

Sizemore, a sixth-generation rancher who operates a spread with her family in Kneeland, said that she, personally, does not care if someone is growing pot, as long as they are good stewards of the land.

“We’re not so much concerned about marijuana itself as we are the environmental issues that are tagged to the industry,” she says. “I think there are growers out there that are being good stewards, unfortunately they have a black mark against them.”

Sizemore drew parallels between traditional ag producers on the Buckeye board and the cannabis industry. When an expose about poor practices in the beef industry hits the headlines, small sustainable producers suffer along with the bad actors. Cannabis farmers endure the same kind of scrutiny.

“Across the entire agricultural board, 90 percent are doing things correctly, but it’s the 10 percent that get the spotlight, and makes the entire industry look bad,” she says. “It’s fairly extreme.”

Of course, farmers, ranchers and loggers do have a regulatory infrastructure in place to enforce proper environmental practices. Similar oversight for the cannabis industry is still in fledgling stages. To that end, while the board’s position paper specifically says it does not condone the industry, it would like to see it properly regulated, with growers “held to the same regulatory standards as farming, timber, dairy and ranching.”

Along with a host of land-use regulations, including compliance with various regulatory boards, the Conservancy takes a stance against cultivation on timberland or prime ag lands. This is in response to a cornerstone concern for the group — the fragmentation of family-owned land and habitat — as land prices skyrocket and the inherited knowledge of their group’s base fails to filter down to the next generation. The cannabis industry, Sizemore believes, has exacerbated a nationwide trend. According to 2014 statistics from the U.S. Department of Labor, the median age for farmers and ranchers in the United States is 55.9 years.

The inflated price of land in Humboldt County has made homesteads unattainable for young would-be farmers, and many who inherit land from parents and grandparents may prefer to sell at a profit rather than make a living on the slim profit margins of timber and cattle. Sizemore, who is in her 30s, is in a rapidly shrinking peer group, even as the cannabis bubble expands beyond the point of fiscal, environmental and social sustainability.

“Once the huge giant market has gone out of it, people our age will be forced to find a job in means they’re not used to,” she says. “I have concerns about what’s going to happen to the generations who have just grown up growing pot, received hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars each year.” ●

No Confidence

As the Journal went to press April 11, the Humboldt County Board of Supervisors convened in closed session to discuss complaints against and the job performance of its embattled new public defender, David Marcus.

The supervisors' conversation comes a day after eight members of the non-attorney staff of the public defender's office sent the board a scathing letter alleging that Marcus has "crippled" the office, has given clients "completely inaccurate" legal advice and "literally attempts to have non-lawyer support staff provide him with answers to legal questions." The letter comes just about two weeks after all nine of the office's deputy public defenders sent the board a similar missive, alleging Marcus is unqualified and unfit for his position.

In addition to the unprecedented letters from the public defender's office staff, the board is also facing a lawsuit brought by local attorney Patrik Griego alleging that Marcus doesn't meet minimum state qualifications for his position and asking a superior court judge to rule him ineligible for the job. The lawsuit hinges on a California statute that requires a public defender to have been practicing in "all the courts of the state for at least the year preceding" his or her hire.

The board, meanwhile, has been largely silent on Marcus since his hire, though it has defended the move, issuing a brief statement touting Marcus' more than 20 years of experience in criminal defense work and stating that he meets all statutory requirements for the position.

Immediately following Marcus' hire, members of the local criminal defense bar raised questions about his qualifications, noting that he's been living in Florida for some years and hasn't practiced criminal law in California, which has undergone its biggest reform in decades with prison realignment in 2012 and Proposition 47 in 2014. The letter from public defender' employees sent April 10 alleges Marcus has failed to keep current.

"He lacks even basic current criminal law knowledge and literally attempts to have non lawyer support staff provide him with answers to legal questions," the letter states. "We are not confident that anything we relay to our clients from him is correct, and in fact, some of us have seen clear instances when his advice and statements to clients were completely inaccurate and not in accordance with current statutes that we have been trained on. ... Additionally, Mr. Marcus lacks leadership skills, further burdening our staff. We no longer have a boss that we can rely upon for support. Instead, Mr. Marcus actually relies on all of us to explain most details to him, even in the most basic of criminal defense procedures."

The letter closes by alleging Marcus is creating an "unreasonable burden" on employees and exposing them to the risk of lawsuits.

Marcus has repeatedly not responded to Journal interview requests for our coverage of the issue.

For more on this story, including a look at a deposition transcript that raises questions about the accuracy of the resume Marcus submitted to the county, visit www.northcoastjournal.com.

An Iranian student's struggle to reunite with his girlfriend and continue his education at HSU

By Sam Armanino

Mohammad Maleki, a 23-year-old Humboldt State University student, sits in the back row of his political science class.

When Mohammad Maleki finally arrived at the small Turkish hotel room down the road from the airport, he put down his luggage — which held a bag of Iranian pistachios he'd bought for a professor — and crashed onto the bed to sleep.

He didn't know it yet, but that small brown room down the street from the Istanbul airport would become his temporary home as he waited out the executive order President Donald Trump had signed the day before, banning people from seven majority Muslim countries — including Maleki's native Iran — from entering the United States.

All together, HSU has 108 international students who are studying in California using F1 or J1 visas, which are for visitors and students. Twenty-eight of those hail from areas considered part of the Middle East and three are from the countries originally banned in Trump's order: Maleki, his girlfriend and a student from Yemen.

Maleki was HSU's only international student who had trouble traveling back to Arcata for the spring semester, according to the school's international department. According to the Washington Post, the 23-year-old was one of more than 42,500 Iranians affected by the travel ban, which was signed with little coordination or warning, leading to chaotic scenes in airports around the world as some 90,000 travelers were temporarily denied entry into the United States.

On Jan. 28, the day after Trump signed the executive orders, Maleki found himself facing the toughest decision of his life. With a student visa and a strong desire to reunite with his girlfriend in Arcata and finish his studies, Maleki was stranded in that small hotel room in Turkey. Ultimately, Maleki would see all his plans hang in limbo as the country he'd called home for almost two years denied him, twice.

"It's a right for a country to regulate and protect their borders," Maleki said. "But the way he [President Trump] did it was unacceptable."

Maleki sat in the back of his class in Founders Hall at the top of a hill overlooking Arcata. When his professor walked into the classroom with a pen behind each ear, Maleki's back straightened and he prepared to take notes. Professor Jared Larson began his PowerPoint lecture: "Understanding People in Politics."

Maleki was customarily well dressed in a black sweater, dark blue jeans and leather loafers without socks. He took brief notes with his left hand. Every few minutes, he would nudge his glasses up his nose and offer Larson an understanding nod.

The political science major is hoping to become an international civil rights lawyer and follow in his mother's footsteps. Maleki grew up in a family that valued the American education system. He and his younger brother Amir were born and raised in Tehran, Iran, but moved as kids to study in Dubai, where they attended American schools. They kept a resident visa in the United Emirates but returned to Iran to see family.

Both Maleki's parents studied in the United States and he chose HSU because it's located in a small town, which his parents thought would help him stay focused on his studies.

The Maleki brothers first arrived in Humboldt County back in July of 2015, and remember deplaning at about 6 p.m. after some 20 hours of travel. They were among the only people in the airport, and recalled walking outside to find the streets empty. They surveyed their surroundings and couldn't believe all the trees.

"We came from Dubai where there were no trees, and it was so beautiful and so quiet," Maleki said.

Flying from Dubai, one of the newest cities in the world and home to some of the world's tallest buildings, Arcata seemed small. There were very few people in sight as they checked into a Motel 6 for the night. "I thought we had flown into the wrong place," Amir Maleki said.

About two years later, stuck in Istanbul, Maleki awoke with a start. He'd just had a now recurring nightmare of being arrested and detained on his way back to HSU. He flipped on the TV and cycled through his phone's news feed. He looked for any clue as to the future of the travel bans that were now intertwined with his own.

Halfway across the world, Maleki's girlfriend muffled back her sobs and wiped away tears when she spoke to him on the phone. Jasmine Moeinitabar, a music major, followed Maleki to HSU after the pair spent his first year in Arcata apart. When Moeinitabar arrived on campus, she was studying biology, following her father's hopes of seeing her become a doctor. But she wasn't happy and couldn't imagine practicing medicine for the rest of her life. With a little nudge from Maleki, she followed her passion, switching her major to music so she could spend her days singing, composing and playing the violin.

"Every day, I woke up and there were some changes in the news," Moeinitabar said of that period in late January. "I don't really follow the news. But for Mohammad, I did."

Illustrating the political and arbitrary nature of the travel ban is the fact that it only ensnared Maleki because of a hiccup he encountered while getting his student visa several weeks earlier — one that delayed him just long enough to be banned.

After a routine interview in the American Consulate of Dubai about three weeks before attempting to travel, Maleki went to his local post office to get his renewed visa and passport. He said he expected to find his visa tucked inside the passport, as he had in the past. But this time, something was wrong and he found only a small yellow slip of paper that read, "under administrative process."

Worried, Maleki called his international lawyer to ask what administrative processing could mean. The lawyer told Maleki his visa had been flagged and it could take two to three weeks for it to be cleared.

As the beginning of HSU's spring semester approached just days away, Maleki grew even more nervous. He watched his girlfriend and brother leave on Jan. 17. Finally, after about two weeks of waiting, Maleki received his visa and booked the first flight he could, which was scheduled to depart Jan. 28. On the first school day of HSU's semester, Maleki checked into the International Airport of Dubai, watched as agents stamped his one-time visa and walked to the desk to check his luggage and get a boarding pass.

Right away, Maleki could tell something was wrong. Officials told him he could not fly to the United States and brought him to a side area, where he saw a handful of Iranian families. "Some of them were waiting and some were crying," Maleki said.

Maleki nervously waited and watched as the time passed when he should have boarded the plane to take him to school.

For hours, Maleki waited. He called his family and his international lawyer. There was no telling when the travel ban would lift. Maleki faced one of the most difficult decisions of his life. Because he had a one-time visa that had already been stamped, he couldn't leave the airport or the visa would be void. He also couldn't enter the United States.

With some quick thinking, Maleki found one of the only neighboring countries that would accept him without a visa. He booked a 5 a.m. flight to Istanbul. Tired and worried, he curled up in the corner of the airport's mosque. Using his backpack as a pillow, he tried to sleep but was awoken throughout the night as people came in to pray.

After being jolted awake by that nightmare in his Turkish hotel room, Maleki sent emails to HSU's international department and his professors letting them know about his current situation. Larson — the HSU political science professor and designated recipient of those Iranian pistachios — said he was on the phone with someone when he got the message. He put the phone down to respond immediately.

"I am so sorry to hear this news and for what has happened to you," Larson wrote, saying the news left him ashamed, embarrassed and angry. "I don't know how to express to you how your absence in class, because of this policy, upsets me. There are no words to properly describe how I feel now. You will be missed and I hope that this situation changes sooner rather than later and you can return — if you want to."

Maleki spoke to Moeinitabar every day, which was difficult due to the time difference. She had already been in class for three weeks when Maleki tried to fly into the United States for a second time on Feb. 2, booking a flight that took him from Istanbul to Boston with a layover in Frankfurt, Germany.

Maleki had been following every bit of news he could about the Boston judge who temporarily suspended the executive orders. He had been getting texts from Iranian friends also studying in the United States, who told him of their success entering the country through Boston.

He boarded the plane to Frankfurt without any problems. He then tried to hold back his hopes as he got into the boarding line for a flight to Boston. He said he waited in a long line, right behind an Iranian woman who was attempting to see her son for the first time in a couple of years.

As Maleki approached the gate, he noticed an airline official ushering handfuls of people to the side. A feeling of dread swept over him as he and the woman in front of him were told the airline could not allow them to travel. Again, Maleki found himself in limbo, minus the $1,000 nonrefundable cost of his plane ticket.

“To be honest, they treated me like a criminal,” Maleki said. “But I am only a student.”

— Mohammad Maleki

Short on money and tired of the saga he found himself in, Maleki booked the first flight he could back to Istanbul and would check back into the same small, brownish hotel room he'd stayed in before. There Maleki confronted the options before him: He could return to Iran, which would mean suspending his studies for two years of mandatory military service or he could keep trying to fight through the travel ban in order to continue his education and reunite with his girlfriend.

He was exhausted from days of travel and stress — and found himself hungrily eyeing the pistachios in his suitcase, which represented a tantalizing taste of home. But he refrained and decided to keep trying, returning to the routine of sifting through news feeds for any sort of information that could dictate his future. On Feb. 3, he got it — a federal judge in Seattle had put a national halt on President Trump's executive orders.

Unlike the temporary Boston repeal, which only lasted for seven days and was limited to Massachusetts, this halt was national. On Feb. 4, at about 3 p.m., Maleki's father texted him saying he needed to buy a ticket. Now.

Still uncertain, Maleki called the Istanbul airport, which told him that — as of that moment — he would be able to fly to the United States. They made no guarantees about if or when that might change. He booked a flight to San Francisco for the next day.

On Feb. 5, Maleki arrived at the airport four hours before his plane was scheduled to depart. He checked his luggage and got his boarding pass.

When he got in line at the gate, he was even more anxious than during his previous attempts. He was low on money and wouldn't be able to try again. This was his last chance. He approached the gate, straight faced but nervous, and handed over his boarding pass.

Something was wrong again. An airline official pulled him to the side and told him he needed to wait for a supervisor who handles immigration. For a long 45 minutes, Maleki waited to speak with the Turkish airline official, who was confirming his travel with United States Customs and Immigration Enforcement. Finally, a supervisor approached Maleki — it was good news, he was cleared to travel but needed to board immediately.

Maleki stepped onto the plane, a reunion with his girlfriend and his HSU studies — along with the future he'd envisioned for himself — were all once again within reach. As he searched for his seat, relief washed over him.

He sat down and typed one last message into his phone: "I made it." He hit send. To everyone.

"And that was it," he said.

Two days after Maleki arrived in Arcata, he met with Larson to go over the first exam and several assignments he'd missed. Maleki handed Larson the bag of pistachios which had made the journey with him from Dubai to Istanbul to Frankfurt, then back to Istanbul and to the United States. Larson was surprised and told Maleki he should have just looked after himself.

"It was no problem for me," Maleki told him.

Every Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday you can find Maleki washing dishes in the Jolly Green Giant, the cafeteria for HSU students living in the dorms. "I like washing the dishes there because you get to listen to music," he said.

Maleki and his brother share a two-bedroom apartment in Bayside, with Moenitabar nearby in the same complex.

When not studying, Maleki passes his time watching documentaries or playing around with his camera.

Moenitabar said she loves her life on the North Coast, and has welcomed its culture — and especially the prominence of art in the community. Moenitabar said Iranian universities don't have music programs and generally undervalue the arts, so she's especially grateful for the opportunity Humboldt has brought her. She dreams of becoming a composer.

But she and Maleki are still somewhat in limbo, unsure of when they'll be able to return home to see their families and whether she'll be able to finish her education here.

The second iteration of Trump's travel ban has also been hung up by the courts, and it seems likely the issue is ultimately destined to be decided by the United States Supreme Court months from now.

While Maleki's visa lasts until he graduates in 2019 — meaning that even if the ban is upheld Maleki can stay here until completing his studies — Moenitabar's will expire next year, well before her graduation in 2020. Her future uncertain, Moenitabar is trying to remain optimistic.

"I want to keep studying here as long as [President Trump] doesn't stop me," she said. ●

Art in the airport

By Gabrielle Gopinath
artbeat@northcoastjournal.com

Not long ago, I found myself in the recently renamed California Redwood Coast Humboldt County Airport, looking at art. Perhaps you haven't given much thought to the airport as arts venue — me neither, until my delayed luggage turned into an occasion to contemplate works of art on display as part of the Redwood Art Association's Art at the Airport series. This chance encounter brought home an article of faith: You can learn something about a city by studying the messages posted at its entrances and exits, above all by seeking to understand the city's crude but energetic efforts at self-portraiture.

At baggage claim my fellow travelers and I formed a semicircle around the single conveyor belt. Those of us not greeting loved ones bent over our phones. We were a captive, albeit distracted, audience. The walls in front of us bore glowing placards advertising ways to spend money in this county, casinos and college being the most prominent options. They were about matched in terms of the frequency with which they appeared, and one was sort of the mirror inverse of the other. The healthy, smiling young people in the ads for higher learning said, Better yourself! not with their mouths but with their kind eyes. Meanwhile, Money for nothing! was one of the promises the beautiful fun-loving women in the casino ads were cat-call whispering to travelers.

The ads for Humboldt State University ("More than a university") and Blue Lake Casino ("Nightlife, Humboldt style!") shone from within like screens. Farther from the conveyor belt, large-scale photographic prints of landscapes hung on the walls. At our backs, vitrines were filled with Lori Goodman's sculptures.

I saw them when I turned around. Even under the harsh airport lighting, in my jetlagged state, I could tell this had been an inspired selection. Goodman's "Nests," a set of meditations on exits and entrances, make perfectly good sense at baggage claim. Made from handmade paper stretched tightly over wood frames, they look like egg casings, seedpods or drums.

The shrunken paper mimics substances ranging from tar to rawhide, sometimes taking on a glazed and crispy veneer reminiscent of Thanksgiving turkey. It behaves like the animal skins that stretch across the frame of a traditional sea kayak, puckering at the edges of the frame where it has been shrunk to fit.

The nests' surfaces are riddled with pathways to the outside world. Some bear neat, paired perforations that look like ventilation structures; others have small, ragged exit holes punched through their surfaces, as though occupants had already hatched and flown away. Portals structure occupants' passage from one vessel of containment to the next.

Other works of art on display took a different tack. Landscape photography was predominant. The large, colorful images by Suk Choo Kim, Thomas Allen Bethune, Jim Lowry and Stilson Snow that line the terminal hall offer no insight into airport space but speak eloquently to the natural magnificence of the Humboldt coast, from Bullard's Beach to the Ma-Le'l Dunes. Their appeal to viewers seemed more escapist: Here are some beautiful places where you could be right now, if you weren't in an airport.

At the airport, art gets older, larger and more physically imposing as viewers rise above the ground. Taking the stairs from ground level to the lightly trafficked mezzanine means traveling back in time to the 1950s and '60s, when all of the works on display were created: a large, semi-abstract painting of the California coast, a streamlined chrome memorial to the county's World War II fallen and a metal sculpture depicting a pair of eagles fishing for salmon from a snag.

Back on the ground floor in the south end of the hall, Natalie DiConstanzo shows shapely ceramic vessels in a variety of styles. Laura Zugzda, who photographs her black Friesian horses moving majestically through Humboldt fog, exhibits several of these images throughout the terminal.

Turns out that Zugzda's Baroque horses are the closest things to protagonists on display. The human figure is completely absent, unless you count ads for casinos and universities. Every beach in these photographs is empty; there are no signs of human presence other than the implied one of the traveler-viewer before the frame. Every scene rests like virgin Eden, waiting to be activated by the quiet footsteps of the stoked but respectful viewer when he or she arrives on scene, making sure to leave no trace. Artists are on solid ground when they praise the beauties of this place. Visualizing our proper place within the magnificence remains more challenging.

What should airport art be like, anyway? In the mid-1970s, Brian Eno thought he knew. He conceived of his landmark album Ambient 1: Music for Airports on a long layover in Cologne-Bonn; wearying of muzak, he dreamed of a continuously evolving ribbon of ambient sound. This soundtrack would help travelers manage their transit by underscoring every experience with a reassuring aural flow. It would allay anxiety and relieve ennui. And it would do all this by assuming the modest role of aural wallpaper, never once placing inconvenient demands on listeners' habitually overdrawn attention banks.

I have never heard Music for Airports played in an airport. But Eno's experiment remains an interesting reference point because of the site-specific principles that shaped its form. It offered neither escapism nor diversion but a practically oriented way to pass the time. Art in airports becomes interesting not by seeking to efface the experience of travel, but by prompting traveler-viewers to reflect on our temporarily placeless condition.

The Art at the Airport series is sponsored by the Redwood Art Association. Contact the association for prices or more details. ●

Dinner with an Old Friend

Fried rice with Chinese sausage

By Jennifer Fumiko Cahill

tabletalk@northcoastjournal.com

Short of a meal with an old friend, cooking a recipe from an old friend is the next best thing. A couple of weeks ago, I called Hoa, whom I met when we were at University of California Santa Barbara, to ask for her recipe for fried rice with lap xuong, or Chinese sausage. “You remember,” she said, rattling off the ingredients with a throaty laugh. There were, of course, no measurements, no temperatures and no times. The women in her family, like mine, measure by eye, season by smell and taste, and move the dial on the stove depending on whether the oil pops when you flick water at it or the vegetables are making the right shusssh-shusssh sound in the pan. The only way to learn is to cook alongside them. “You gonna make it?”

Even over the phone, I knew she had her eyebrow way up and a skeptical smile on her freckled face. Back in school, my roommate and I would lure her to come study at our place (really to keep us entertained and awake as we crammed for midterms and finals) with the promise of hot coffee and easy parking. OK, we lied about the parking. Every time. “Liars!”

she'd shout, whipping back her mane of hair and pointing in our faces. She knew we'd appease her with coffee, maybe ice cream, as sure as she knew that parking spot was bullshit.

When we could get a ride and weren't so pressed, we'd go to her place, which was far better because she would cook. She'd grumble in her deep, raspy voice that there was nothing in the fridge and pull out day-old rice and a couple of dark, wrinkled lap xuong (pronounced “lop chong”) — grim looking links that turned dark red and shone like fatty jewels when fried. It's the pancetta of China and Southeast Asia, a little bit of salty-sweet cured pork that goes a long way to flavor a dish. That and judicious use of fish sauce made her fried rice, an elegant dish of pantry staples, utterly different from my family's fridge-cleaning version, in which we dumped everything that could be chopped, swirled with soy sauce and tossed in a wok. Hoa would grin and scold us for eating her food. But she was proud of her cooking, of her ability to make something of almost nothing, and she'd beam while we sighed over our bowls.

I'd never eaten Vietnamese home cooking before I met Hoa, who is Chinese-Vietnamese American. It was on a visit to her family in Los Angeles that I had my first real bowl of pho. I watched her paint the surface of her soup with a labyrinth of Huy Fong Sriracha and followed suit with about half the amount. I was red faced and sweating, trying to breathe — she was red-faced laughing at me across the table.

Hoa's family fled Vietnam in the late 1970s. Her mother tried to get the family onto a boat that was leaving the country but there wasn't enough room for her, Hoa's father and all seven children. Rather than risk being separated, she organized her own boat, scraping money together to pay the captain and crew of the fishing boat as well as bribing officials and anyone who'd need to look the other way. For a year Hoa and her family waited in a Hong Kong refugee camp while they tried to get a sponsor in the U.S. She was 7 years old, living in a warehouse and waiting for her sisters, who found work in the city, to bring her food. At night they slept in three-tiered bunks with plywood beds. This was still better, still safer than home.

I met her mother, a small, quick moving woman, only once before she died. She spoke only in Vietnamese and regarded me with a look I knew from my own immigrant family — a mixture of kindness and caution. I was out in the larger world with her daughter, helping her navigate it and pulling her away into it. She offered me sweets and watched me as I ate.

Hoa lives in the Bay Area now, working with families as a social worker. She tells me it's exhausting, emotional work but it's important. She still makes fried rice for her family and I'm guessing she still gripes and laughs while she cooks. Talking on the phone and cooking it myself is as close as I'll get to a visit with her for a while, but that's OK. It's a chance to tell stories about her, to bask in the pleasure of making something from very little and to enjoy feeding people just because you can.

Lap Xuong Fried Rice

I've swapped in fresh carrot and sliced snow peas, but no shame in frozen peas and carrots, which is what she used back then. You can find the sausage at Asian markets like Lao Oriental Market (2908 E St., Eureka). Got a few extra eggs? Serve them sunny-side-up on top of the rice. Serves 4.

Ingredients and method:

- 1 cup snow peas, trimmed and sliced into diagonal strips
- 1 carrot, chopped in 1/8-inch pieces
- 1/2 bunch green onions, chopped
- 2 cloves garlic, smashed with the flat of a knife and chopped

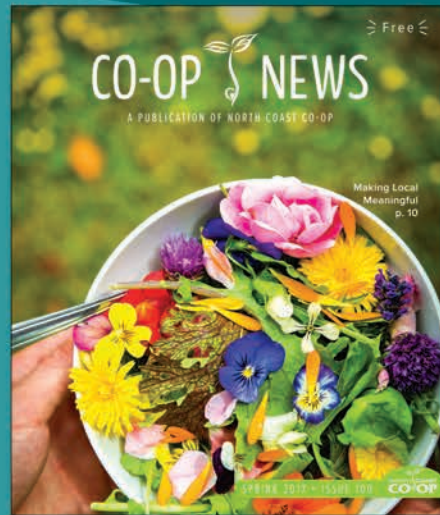

- 2 tablespoons fish sauce
- Salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
- 2 eggs, beaten
- 2 tablespoons vegetable oil
- 4 lap xuong sausages, skins removed and cut into 1/4-inch slices
- 4 cups day-old jasmine rice

In a wok or large frying pan, heat 1/2 tablespoon of oil — moving the oil around to cover the cooking surface — over medium to medium high heat until it sizzles with a drop of water. Pour the beaten eggs into the pan to form a thin omelet and push it lightly with a spatula until you can gently flip it. Slide it onto a plate, cut it into strips and set it aside. (If you're using a wok, do this in two batches.)

Add the remaining 1 1/2 tablespoons of oil to the hot pan along with the sausage and carrot, keeping them moving for 1-2 minutes. When the sausage turns red and glossy, add the green onion, garlic and peas. Stir-fry the ingredients for 1-2 minutes until the peas turn brighter green and the carrots are just tender.

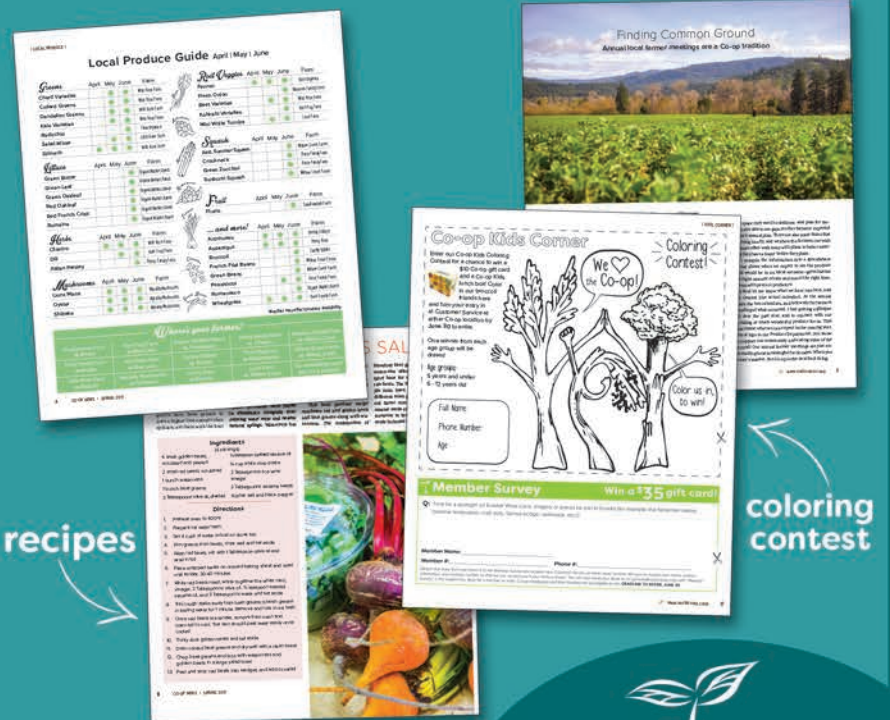

Add the cold jasmine rice a handful at a time, breaking up clumps and incorporating the ingredients with the spatula as you go. Keep everything moving and turn down the heat if necessary to keep the rice from sticking. Swirl the fish sauce over the rice and mix it in with a pinch of salt and a couple of grinds of pepper. Taste and add salt, pepper or fish sauce as needed. Finally, add the sliced omelet and toss it into the rice. Serve hot. ●

An impressive variety of 11 choreographed pieces with 50 dancers compose Luminescence, the Humboldt State University Dance Program's spring concert. The production is the culmination of original student and staff work, crafting choreographies, costuming, staging and lighting. Modern, jazz, hip-hop, contemporary and other dance styles are included in the many interpretations performed. Luminescence is a recital, so the audience should forgive the overlong pauses between acts. The breaks are deliberate, allowing the audience to familiarize themselves with the programmed intent of the choreographers. And the performances are worth the wait.

The flow of the opening night performance was well constructed, balancing higher energy sets with slower, more contemplative ones. Luminescence starts off with a piece for seven dancers, Redemption, choreographed and costumed by Edgar Ocelotl. The choreography is a strong combination of multi-layered placement and motion. Spot-on music and lighting made this a great choice with which to start the evening.

Audience reaction was strongest with Fire in In Her Eyes, Power in Her Soul and Reciprocity. In Fire, I found the lighting distractingly dark, though this was partially compensated by the reflective costumes. Reciprocity achieved a notable dramatic effect, drawing a collective gasp from the audience at a climactic moment. Costuming was very effective for many of the pieces, including Through the Lens of Love, Fire in Her Eyes, Jet Set and Give Me Your Tired, Your Poor...

The work Reveries of Youth, choreographed and costumed by Austin

Silavong, gave soloist Lisa Drew the opportunity to display her power and interpretive flexibility. The choreography was challenging, adding miming moves that painted a picture of childhood. However, when joined with the rest of the piece, they felt mismatched, causing an interruption within the entire choreographic flow.

Jessie Rawson's choreography Jet Set was pure fun. It harkens back to 1960s musical theater with dancers costumed as flight attendants. At all times, the dancers were clearly having a ball and their energy was projected into the house.

Associate professor of dance Sharon Butcher choreographed Give Me Your Tired, Your Poor..., a dramatic piece with eight dancers, costumed in earth-tones, expressing anguish and struggle. It carried tremendous emotional weight and showed some of the best acting of the evening. This piece was also presented at the American College Dance Conference in March of this year.

The final choreography, Blue Print, performed by the Demolition Dancers, capped off the evening with fast-paced, high-energy choreography. The precision of these dancers was both impressive and enjoyable.

Luminescence shows skilled dancing, exceptional acting and stage presence with successful transitions of mood and energy. The HSU Department of Theater, Film and Dance has achieved notable success with this production — catch it while you can.

Performances of Luminescence continue at the Van Duzer Theatre from Thursday, April 13 through Friday, April 15 at 7:30 p.m., with a Sunday, April 16 show at 2 p.m. Tickets are available at the door and the University Ticket Office. Call 826-3928. ●

There and Back Again, a Musician's Tale

By Andy Powell

thesetlist@northcoastjournal.com

We here in Humboldt are lucky. It's easy to forget but deep down we know that. We live in a rural part of the state that's hard to get to and have a low average median income for a family of four compared to much of the rest of California, if my memory is correct. I could go on but I won't. There are also tremendous upsides: It's one of the most gorgeous spots on the planet and our "rat race" is more of a rat power-walk. We've also got a concentrated wealth of artists and musicians among us. Sometimes those artists leave Humboldt but often those who keep with their art come back when they can. One such musician returning to our pristine neck o' the woods is Lila Nelson.

Many of you have probably caught Lila performing her songs during intimate singer/songwriter shows over the many years Lila lived up here. Many remember her as the host of KHUM's "Meet Me in the Morning" program. She's one of our more celebrated singer/songwriters and many were sad to see her go. I heard Lila was returning to town for her first Humboldt show in about five years, and I was able to catch her quickly after she put her daughter to sleep. Lila told me that she and her husband, Ian, had recently spent about a year living in Italy close to a town called Bra in Piedmont, which has a slightly larger population than Eureka. While Ian was studying gastronomy and traditional Italian cuisine, their daughter learned to speak some Italian and got to know some extended family living in the region. Lila described this short bit of their lives as the "Eat, Pray, Change Diapers" period. Will that eventually be reflected in her catalogue? I don't see how it couldn't — she's already got a great album title.

Speaking of new songs, Lila has been working on one called "Sung Un-Hero," which she tells me is topical but has been difficult to correctly write. She said, "when [Trump] was elected, people in Italy said almost comically, 'Oh, he's your Berlusconi! It's your turn!' I take it a little further." When asked if she's planning on getting back into the studio anytime soon she told me, "Yes. Tiny Telephone opened in Oakland recently and I have some time booked there. I'm actually studying nursing right now so I'm feeling some anatomy-themed music-to-have-a-revolution-by." As for what to expect for Lila's show (more on that below), she mentions that she's "previewing a bunch of new songs and dragging out some B sides for the first time. Even playing a few on the piano, which I don't usually do live. A pretty good mix of old and new. My setlist is always in pencil ... I've spent so much time in Arcata it still feels like home, even though it's been a while. I really appreciate being able to come back and have people support my art, whatever form it takes. I'm grateful." So welcome this former local-troubadour back to town this weekend.

Thursday

You can get your pre-Arts Arcata game on tonight at the Redwood Curtain Brewery, which is celebrating its seventh anniversary with local indie-grass powerhouse The Absynth Quartet. The band will be jamming away around 8 p.m. and all for free. Celebrate good local beer with good local music.

Friday

Arts Arcata is upon us and as of press time, the weather should be non-rainy. That means you can stroll around the Arcata Plaza and soak up the myriad of local musicians and bands vibrating the air. If art + Arcata ain't your thing, perhaps check out local rockers Wild Otis at the Mad River Brewery Tap Room at 6 p.m. this evening. They're playing for free and you can get your hands on a copy of their new release Don't Let Me Fall. You can bring the kids out to Cafe Mokka around 8 p.m. for some hot cocoa while you caffeinate and hear the Celtic tunes of Good Company, also playing for free. Experimental funk/fusion is on the bill at The Miniplex in Arcata, courtesy of Oakland-based Wicked Man, supported by local soul rockers Velvet Touch and fellow local heavy funksters Peach Purple. The show starts around 9 p.m. — bring $10 for the ticket. The Green Week Kick-Off Party is in full force tonight at Humboldt Brews at

Lila Nelson plays the Arcata Playhouse at 8 p.m. on Saturday, April 15.

10 p.m. Get your groove on with D'Vinity, ILL-ESHA, and MIMOSA (I'm unclear which of those previous 16 letters should have been capitalized), who'll be cranking out the bass and booty-shakin' jams. This party's got a $27 ticket price.

Saturday

Local blues and R&B band the Lost Dogs are up at the Mad River Brewery around 6 p.m. and playing for free. As mentioned above, former local songstress/storyteller/Morning DJ Lila Nelson is in town to play music for the first time after her time abroad. With folky roots and insightful and oft-times whimsical lyrics, she'll be joined by fellow Nelson sister — and still local — Siena Nelson, whom you have most likely seen and heard with the numerous bands she's performed in here in Humboldt County. I got late word that fellow Renaissance woman Jackie Dandneau will be rounding out this bill, so you're in for a trio treat. Show starts at 8 p.m. and is only $15 at the Arcata Playhouse. Helping to celebrate the seventh anniversary of Redwood Curtain Brewery tonight is local Pink Floyd Tribute Money (with yours truly) who will take the stage at 8 p.m. and for free. Co-founder of the record label Sublime Frequencies, Hisham Mayet is stopping by town to spin an eclectic and international mix of world tunes and grooves at The Miniplex around 10 p.m. Expect songs and sounds from "Laos, Vietnam, Iraq, Syria, Ethiopia, Western Sahara" as the press release notes. A $10 bill gets you in the door.

Arlo Guthrie comes up the road to visit us here in Humboldt. On the road with his band Shenandoah (comprised of Terry A La Berry, Steve Ide, Carol Ide and Abe Guthrie), Arlo's Running Down The Road Tour brings some of his favorite cuts from his late '60s and early '70s catalogue. If you don't already have a ticket, you probably don't want to hesitate. Arlo's at the Van Duzer Theatre at 8 p.m. with a $56 ticket price.

Tuesday

Sticking with the Van Duzer, Charles Lloyd & the Marvels will be on the stage tonight at 8 p.m. A jazz giant, Lloyd has played saxophone with many of the greats. Let me just run down an abbreviated list of some of the folks Charles has played with and/or alongside: Howlin' Wolf, B.B. King, Charlie Mingus, Keith Jarrett, The Doors, The Grateful Dead, Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin, Cream and Jefferson Airplane. He's recently released a cover of Bob Dylan's "Masters of War," which is, sadly, always a relevant song (here's to the day when it won't be). Joining him on that recording and at the show tonight is Lucinda Williams. $46 will get you a seat to see one of the saxophone greats. ●

Egg Scramble

It's that time of year when kids dressed in their springtime best swarm grassy lawns, searching for little pastel pods filled with chocolates, jelly beans and other sweet stuff. So where can your little peeps snatch Easter eggs or pose for photos with the bun of the hour? They're all happening this Saturday, April 15 all over the county.

At the north end, head to McKinleyville Safeway Shopping Plaza at 10 a.m. for the McKinleyville Easter Egg Hunt (free). The hunt will be divided into age groups to keep things sane. Then there's the City of Blue Lake Easter Egg Hunt from 1 to 2 p.m. at Perigot Park (free). It's also separated into four different age divisions with a special golden egg hidden in each.

Heading south, Eureka's Carson Park Easter "Egg-Venture" is from 10 a.m. to noon at Carson Park (free) and has the kiddos following Easter clues, completing challenges and posing with the Easter Bunny. Bring your camera! Ferndale's Easter Egg Hunt is at 10:30 a.m. in Ferndale Firemen's Park (free) with prizes in four age categories (check at Valley Lumber for the fun if it's raining). Rio Dell's Fireman's Park is the scene for Rio Dell Community Resource Center's Community Egg Hunt from 10:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m., and SoHum's Community Easter Egg Hunt gathering from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. at Southern Humboldt Community Park features barbecue, chili, hot dogs, a bake sale, obstacle course, a bounce house and more. The egg hunt starts at noon, sharp (free).

High Times

With two weed-centric events coming up, this is going to be a busy week for some folks and an extremely chill one for others. First, there's Cannifest, "Humboldt's Manifest Cannabis Festival & Trade Gathering," happening Saturday, April 15 from 11 a.m. to 2 a.m. and Sunday, April 16 from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m. at Redwood Acres Fairgrounds ($35 single day, $50 weekend pass).

The weekend gathering celebrating the cannabis culture and crop is chock-full of informative and fun activities. Attendees can check out vendor booths, listen to industry panelists, spend time in Area 215, the family interactive zone and watch the popular "Grow Games," where teams showcase their farming skills and vie for high-stakes prizes. There's also a healthy lineup of live music both days on seven stages with favorites Phutureprimitive, Fishbone, The Polish Ambassador, Object Heavy and Prezident Brown, as well as a silent disco. The Humboldt Cannabis Job Fair is on Sunday, so dress for the job you want.

Redway celebrates the cannabis holiday of 4/20 with the 420 World Fest on, you guessed it, Thursday, April 20 ($30). The noon to midnight party at the Mateel Community Center features music all day with headliner John Kadlecik (Furthur, Phil and Friends, Dark Star Orchestra, Golden Gate Wingman) bringing his solo acousti'lectric sound, as well as the Maui Pranksters, Good Ol Boys, Camo Cowboys and more. There'll be food, vendors and the event that really packs 'em in: the Joint Rolling Contest (215 required).

Cringeworthy

Toni Erdmann's dad jokes

By Grant Scott-Goforth

filmland@northcoastjournal.com

TONI ERDMANN. I pride myself on an appreciation of bizarre cinema, from camp to cult to psychedelic to oddball. It's not that I'm steely — plenty of genre films leave me unnerved or nonplussed. I cannot claim to understand Mulholland Drive or have particularly liked Holy Motors; nor are the charms of a blockbuster or crowd pleaser lost on me. But I relish movies that do new things, that challenge audiences or go in unexpected directions.

The last thing I expected out of Toni Erdmann, a well-received German comedy/drama, was to walk out of the theater shell-shocked. There's not an ounce of gore and aside from one scene it barely registered as an R-movie. It's not even an outlandish film but the relentless grind of cringiness, punctuated by genuine poignancy and peculiar moments left me with a lot to unpack over my post-movie beer.

Toni Erdmann is challenging and unexpected, and while not an utter delight, puts together enough touching, laugh-out-loud and memorable moments to be, well, unforgettable.

It opens with Winfried (Peter Simonischek) — overweight, shabbily dressed, unshaven with long, shaggy gray hair hanging in his eyes — pulling a small but elaborate prank on a delivery man. It's clear that Winfried has an active imagination and a general indifference to decorum or humiliation. He favors irreverent songs and a janky set of false teeth, which his few friends and family members seem to politely tolerate. Winfried lives a small life with his old blind dog Willi in a German suburb, teaching piano to kids, visiting his aging mother and stopping by his ex-wife's house — in zombie face makeup — when his daughter Ines (Sandra Hüller) visits.

Ines is overworked and underappreciated. On holiday from her headquarters in Bucharest, she spends most of her visit home fielding work phone calls. She and her father part having shared few words, back to their respective lifestyles. Shortly thereafter, Willi dies, kicking off a shaggy dog story with a shaggy dad — Winfried — at the center.

Winfried decides to surprise Ines in Leaning in at work.

Toni Erdmann

Bucharest. He waits for hours in the lobby of her highrise office but when she walks by in a scrum of businessmen, she ignores him, only sending her assistant down afterward to catch him.

Ines works for a firm consulting with a Romanian oil giant, the CEO of which may or may not want to outsource a portion of his labor. The weekend Winfried arrives, Ines is knee-deep in shit. The CEO is in town, and she has to juggle her ambitious plan to get his ear, entertain his wife and keep her prank-prone father occupied.

Winfried's lackadaisical attitude doesn't jive with Ines. This, unsurprisingly, leads to a series of uncomfortable situations and increasingly tense fights between daughter and father. Eventually, having gotten a taste of her unnervingly busy and goal-oriented life, Winfried packs his bags and heads home, only to reappear in a cheap, gaudy suit, false teeth and a cast-off Gene Simmons wig. He has become Toni Erdmann, a consultant to billionaire Romanian businessmen. Under this guise, he mounts a campaign to insert himself into Ines' life.

This is when things get weird. Ines tries a variety of tactics as Toni Erdmann shows up at social functions and her workplace.

She fights back in her way — ignoring him, then pleading with him, shocking him. But Toni — er, Winfried — doesn't relent. Did he have a mental break? Is it possible for him to get out of his character? His pranks begin to become more and more threatening to Ines' career, among others. There's a moment when he seems to realize his pranks can have adverse effects on people's lives but he continues to push, perhaps unaware of how to connect with his daughter in any other way.

As Ines is pressed more and more by her father and her work, cracks begin to show in larger and larger bouts of spontaneity. It's unclear if those are hand-me-downs from her father — whether nature or nurture — and it's equally unclear if they're symptoms of an impending breakdown or awakening. It culminates in one of cinema's most awkward party scenes.

At nearly three hours, Toni Erdmann never drags, and it contains a surprisingly complex set of issues, highlighting Ines' secondary status as a woman in the upper echelons of business and the stark disparity of wealth in Romania. It also has some poignant messages about the relationships parents have with their children, about the different worlds they occupy and how they try to close — or maintain — the distance between them.

Toni Erdmann's awkwardness accounts for much of its buzz. I'm not particularly familiar with German cinema but if writer-director Maren Ade was trying to break Britain's monopoly on cringe humor, she's succeeded. The cinema verite style, coupled with Hüller's remarkable performance, serves to heighten the discomfort of the whole experience. Rather than being framed as something to laugh at — like the awkward, comic nudity of Forgetting Sarah Marshall — Ade's direction places the audience right there in the scene, breathing in every molecule of embarrassment. Ultimately, it's suitably ambiguous — comfort and dignity be damned. R. 162M. MINOR (THROUGH APRIL 13).

NOTICE TO POTENTIAL BIDDERS: If you are considering bidding on this property lien, you should understand that there are risks involved in bidding at a trustee auction. You will be bidding on a lien, not on the property itself. Placing the highest bid at a trustee auction does not automatically entitle you to free and clear ownership of the property. You should also be aware that the lien being auctioned off may be a junior lien. If you are the highest bidder at the auction, you are or may be responsible for paying off all liens senior to the lien being auctioned off, before you can receive clear title to the property. You are encouraged to investigate the existence, priority, and size of outstanding liens that may exist on this property by contacting the county recorder's office or a title insurance company, either of which may charge you a fee for this information. If you consult either of these resources, you should be aware that the same lender may hold more than one mortgage or deed of trust on the property. NOTICE TO PROPERTY OWNER: The sale date shown on this notice of sale may be postponed one or more times by the mortgagee, beneficiary, trustee, or a court, pursuant to Section 2924g of the California Civil Code. The law requires that information about trustee sale postponements be made available to you and to the public, as a courtesy to those not present at the sale. If you wish to learn whether your sale date has been postponed, and, if applicable, the rescheduled time and date for the sale of this property, you may call (844) 477-7869 or visit this Internet Web site WWW.STOXPOSTING.COM, using the file number assigned to this case 050997-CA. Information about postponements that are very short in duration or that occur close in time to the scheduled sale may not immediately be reflected in the telephone information or on the Internet Web site. Bad Sea Rising

By Barry Evans

fieldnotes@northcoastjournal.com

As our climate warms, one of the more under-recognized consequences for future generations is global sea level rise (GSLR), especially considering that nearly 4 billion people on Earth live within 100 miles of the coast. In this and the following column, I'll try to answer some questions I keep hearing, starting with the obvious ...

How much will sea level rise?

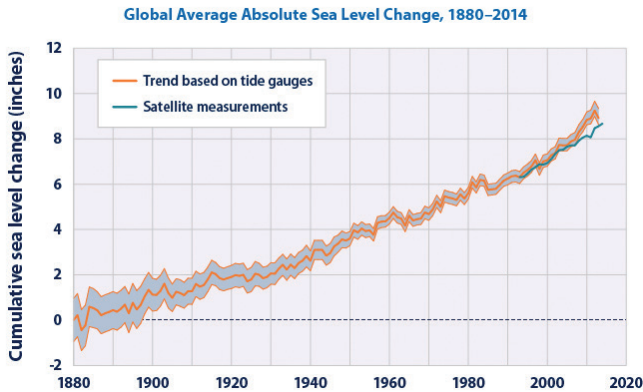

The consensus is between 3 and 6 feet by the year 2100. The US Army Corps of Engineers foresees a GSLR of more than 5 feet. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) predicts more than 3 feet (unrealistically) assuming that contributions from polar ice sheets remain stable. Last January, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) hedged its bets, predicting anywhere between 1 and 8 feet. Meanwhile, many geologists predict a rise between 10 and 30 feet.

Why can't they agree on a number?

Even for the smartest climatologists using the fastest computers in the world, the problem is insanely tough because of so many uncertainties, which include: sketchy sea level data prior to 1993 (when altimetry data from satellites became available); the inconsistency of sea level rise across the globe; and — the biggest elephant in the room — the future of the West Antarctic ice sheet.

But right now the sea level is rising?

Yes. Satellite data shows an average GSLR of about 3 inches over the course of the last 24 years and the trend is accelerating. Using less accurate data from old local records and from core samples, GSLR has risen by about 8 inches since 1880, when we started pumping great volumes of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

Tracking 140 years of rising sea levels, roughly coinciding with our use of fossil fuels.

(EPA graphic based on NOAA and CSIRO data)

I thought sea levels varied wildly long before the Industrial Revolution?

Back in the last ice age, which peaked about 18,000 years ago, oceans were almost 400 feet below their present levels. But the oceans have been pretty stable for the last 2,000 years, changing their levels by a mere couple of feet. More than the actual levels, though, it's the unprecedented speed of the current change that is so alarming.

How do rising air temperatures affect the oceans?

As the atmosphere warms, oceans absorb 80-90 percent of the extra heat.

So? Why does this lead to the rise of sea levels?

1. Warm water, being less dense than cold, takes up more volume, thus accounting for between 30 and 50 percent of the current rise (the range demonstrating the uncertainties of the science). The good news is that the warming of water in the ocean depths happens very slowly; the bad news is that it's unstoppable. Even if greenhouse gas emission ceased right now, the surface-to-depth exchange of ocean water would continue for centuries.

2a. Fresh water melting from Earth's two "big ice buckets," the Antarctica and Greenland ice sheets, adds to the volume of the oceans. Two thirds of Earth's fresh water is trapped in Antarctic ice.

2b. Fresh water from mountain glaciers and smaller polar ice caps also adds to the oceans, although to a lesser extent than 2a.

Next time, we'll look at more issues related to rising sea levels, in particular the role of Antarctica and Greenland. ●

Barry Evans (barryevans9@yahoo.com) notes that Humboldt County and the California Coastal Commission is hosting a workshop on sea level rise May 4. Contact Vanessa.Metz@coastal.ca.gov
